(From the New Zealand Colonist, January 14th.) Progress of the Sandwich Islanders.

From the fact of the probable unity of race of the aboriginal peoples of New Zealand and of the Sandwich Islands, the colonists of New Zealand who are interested in the condition of the native race, will also feel somewhat of interest in what concerns the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands. Here, in New Zealand, whether by a want of properly devised schemes for training the Maori to habits of self-government, or from inability of the people to understand what self-government means (probably the latter), all attempts to give political power to the Maori have been failures; and, doubtless, another failure will shortly be exhibited, when the four Maori chiefs who are to be elected by the natives to represent them in the House of Representatives take their places in the Assembly. As a rule the natives of New Zealand have exhibited a greater aptitude to adopt the vices of civilized Europeans, than to imitate their virtues. Of the so-called Christianity of the Maori, little can be said in praise. At the best it is a very thin film that scarcely covers the innate animalism of the Maori character. The educational efforts on their behalf cannot be termed successful. Some natives can read the Maori Scriptures, but the number is small as compared with the extent of the native population; and we believe we are right in saying that with few exceptions, the Christianity and "civilization" of the Maori, where either exist at all, are, at the best, but skin deep.

The natives of the Sandwich Islands own, it is believed, a common origin with the natives of New Zealand. It is a singular fact that the tradition of the New Zealander points to the Sandwich Islands as the locality whence they came; while the educated Sandwich Islanders declare that they came originally from New Zealand. The language also bears marks of common origin. The words "Waimea" and "Wai-iti" have the same signification in both languages; and "no," which in Maori is "ka-hore," is "aore," in Hawaiian. And there are many more words GALVANIZED AND UNGAL- which one well sequainted with either language would at once recognize in the other. The physienl appearance and the features of the two peoples present a marked similarity, the Sandwich Islander being the more handsome and intelligent, and, as respect the females, entirely eclipsing their New Zealand sisters in personal charms, a circumstance which may arise from the fact that in Hawaii the women are not made beasts of burden, as a majority of them are in New Zealand, where they become old before their time. It were fruitless to attempt to account for the disparity of intellectual progress among the natives of New Zenland and those of the Hawaiian Islands. Probably the long continuance of war with the colonists may have had some influence in retarding the progress of the New Zealander; and no doubt the lower position and slavish work of the women may have tended to the same result. Whatever the cause, we find in the Sandwich Islands the people governing themselves under a constitutional monarchy, adopting the arts and accomplishments of European civilization, while in New Zealand the aborgines have shown little aptitude for such improvement; and as for self-government or constitutions they do not un-derstand either.

From some published documents, and a volume of the Constitution and Laws of the Kingdom of Pactioniar attention given to the sale and purchase of mer- within little more than twenty years. The code relates to the Executive powers of Ministers, the management of public lands, trade and commerce, the coasting traffic, licenses of various trades, harbors, channels, beacons, buoys, rivers, wharfs, fisheries, gaols, agriculture and manufactures, (with a view to the advancement of these pursuits,) police, public health, patents, foreign affairs, finance, taxes, customs, education, roads, elections, the domestic relations, and many other subjects from most of which numerous useful hints might be derived by people and places of more pretension than the Sandwich Islands.

The Legislature is composed of a Lower House, consisting of thirty-three elected members, of whom about three-fourths are native gentlemen, the others being Europeans or Americans; -and an Upper House, called the House of Nobles, who sit either by right of their ancestral positions as generally Europeans in the Supreme Court. There is trial by jury in both civil and criminal cases, with a mixed jury of Kanakas and English when the cause is between parties of the two Hongsty.—Alexander T. Stewart, of New York, races. In their courts there are native lawyers may fairly be said to be the first merchant in the conceived of the best specimens of the pure Maori of New Zealand; and not seldom they puzzle and get the better of European bred pleaders.

As regards education, the people of the Sandwich Islands have made great progress. In every district throughout the islands, there are common schools supported by a school tax, and in which the native and English languages are taught by law, together with the other ordinary branches of lish boys are taught, and subjected to strict half yearly examinations. It has occurred several times that boys, both natives and the sons of European parents, have gone to England from this College, and have gained honors at English Universities. This is the brighter side of the condition of the Sandwich Islands, and of the advancement of the natives.

It is true there is a darker side to the picture, and that is the decrease of the people. The diminution of the population is going on at a ratio much greater than even that of the aborigines of New Zealand; but the population is still large, and, though of late years it has been lessening (whether from the seeming inevitable law that the aborigine recedes before the pure white man, or from whatever cause), still, certain it is that the race which in the Sandwich Islands claims close kindred with the New Zealand natives, has exhibited a capacity for a far higher civilization, fond is dead." "How did it happen?" "Why, than that of which the aborigines of New Zealand have shown, or are ever likely to show, themselves capable.

THE RUSSIAN VICTORIES IN CENTRAL ASIA .- Telegrams have come to hand in London via Alexandria and Malta, reporting that the Russian army, which had been steadily advancing in Central Asia for some time past under the command of Major General Romanoffsky, had reached the ancient and populous city of Bokhara, which appears to have been the objective point of their march from the border of the imperial territory on the way towards Southern Asia The Bokharian troops, said to consist of men sicked for war surposes from a population numbering over one hundred and eighty thousand souls, met them at the base of their civic ramparts and from behind their twelve fortified gates and precipitated in a fight. A bloody battle ensued. Russians were victorious, and captured Bokhara. The Bokharian army was commanded by the Khan in person, who was killed either in the field or in some of the narrow streets which intersect the city. Russian interests are jubilant, and Russians and their friends point out the persistency of their commander and soldiers from the commencement of their operations in Chinese Turkestan, during the native revolt in Yar-kand, a couple of years since, to the present, when they will be enabled to threaten the whole northwestern border of British India towards Afghanistan by holding Bokhara. The facts are pointed out that by judicious combinations of his troops and rapid marches, performed under the most intense heat, General tomanofisky was enabled to fight the battle of Irdiar, on the banks of the Jaxartes, or Syr Daria, on the 20th of May, 1866; that he defeated the Bokharians, after a bloody engagement, and opened the way to a series of Russian victories which have established the military power of the empire in the entire country north of the Jaxartes from the "Celestial Mountains" to Lake Aral, and places a Christian force in the heart of Touran. At Irdjar the Russian Cossacks met the Bokharian cavalry and routed them. The Emir of Bokhara directed the fire of twenty-one guns of heavy calibre on Romanoffsky's artillery, but the Russian general, in reporting his reply, says: "Not a shot of ours missed its aim." The result of the Social stimulus is always a great quickener: fight of Irdjar led to the fall of the Bokharian for-

Retreating to the eminently to be desired, and as the only wholecity, they closed the gates and barricaded the some tonic for dignified and respectable men and streets at all points. On the 5th of June, 1866, women of three-score and ten, you would inauguthe Russians stormed Khodjent at many points, having cannonaded it with eighteen guns and two mortars during four days, and entered it. They mortars during four days, and entered it. They were met bravely, and the ground contested foot to foot in the streets and alleyways, but Romonoffsky obtained the victory and city. This result eparated Bokhara from Khokan. Tachkend was next taken by the Russians on the 29th of August,, and from this point they have gone on to the conquest of Bokhara itself. The news of this, the latest Russian victory in Central Asia, has produced a very decided sensation in London, it being regarded as a complete offset on the part of the Czar to the recent gain of England's ally, Shere Ali Khan, in Kandahar, as affecting the issue of the grand question of future supremacy in Asia.

They were almost stationary during the next ten years, notwithstanding the increase of population; indeed, they rather retrograded, their number in 1833 being estimated at only 10,200,000. In 1835 they rose to about 11,200,000. In 1839, the year before the introduction of the penny postage, they were 12,480,000. In 1840 they bounded suddenly to 20,372,000, and in 1844 they reached 27,000, 600. In nine years afterward (1853) they were 43,000,000. In 1855 London was divided into ten districts, by which very much more rapid delivery was obtained for local letters. The consequence was that in 1858, the third year after the alteration, local letters had risen to 58,404,000. and in 1862 to 71,691,000. In 1865 there were about 90,000,000, of which upward of 16,000,000 were delivered in the districts in which they were posted. At the present time the average daily delivery of letters in London is about 560,000, of which about half are local and half from abroad. The number of newspapers and bookpackets delivered is about 55,000. Sir Cusack asserts that, if London correspondence continues to increase as it has in recent years, it will soon be necessary to have half hourly collections and deliveries during chiefs, or are elevated thereto by patent of the King. There are law courts, with able judges, don local letters are the most profitable that the Post Office handles, and that a considerable por-

The young gymnast is gaining new ability far in excess of anything that could be in the extent of his business or the amount of his power daily; the aged one should cling to what profits, and his success is a tribute alike to his individual energy and tact, and to the marvellous life. Exercise is as indispensable to him as food, business resources of the United States. It is worth knowing, both by business men and the public at large, that Mr. Stewart ascribes much of his success to moral causes. > A CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS .- Maimon was valet to a Count. One day his master, on returning from a tournament, encountered Maimon, and asked him where he was going. "And who frightened my horse?" "Your son who fell down in front of it out of a top window." "My son! Great heaven! Where were his nurse and his mother? Is he wounded?" "Yes, sire; he was killed on the spot; and when his corpse was taken up to Madame she was so horrified at the sight that she fell forward in a fit, as if she, too, were dead." "Scoundrel!
